The first part of the paper is devoted to a discussion of the various methods which have been employed for the determination of the rate of reaction between a gas and a solid. It is found that the most reliable method is that of measuring the change in weight of the solid as the reaction proceeds. This method is applicable to all cases in which the solid is not volatile and the gas is not absorbed by the solid. In cases where the solid is volatile or the gas is absorbed, other methods must be employed. These methods include the measurement of the change in volume of the gas, the measurement of the change in pressure, and the measurement of the change in the concentration of the gas. Each of these methods has its own advantages and disadvantages, and the choice of method depends upon the nature of the reaction and the materials involved.

The second part of the paper is devoted to a discussion of the various factors which influence the rate of reaction between a gas and a solid. It is found that the rate of reaction is influenced by the temperature, the pressure, the concentration of the gas, and the nature of the solid. The rate of reaction increases with increasing temperature, increasing pressure, and increasing concentration of the gas. The rate of reaction also increases with increasing surface area of the solid. The nature of the solid also influences the rate of reaction, with more reactive solids reacting more rapidly than less reactive solids.

The third part of the paper is devoted to a discussion of the various theories which have been proposed to explain the rate of reaction between a gas and a solid. It is found that the most widely accepted theory is that of the collision theory. According to this theory, the rate of reaction is determined by the number of collisions between the gas molecules and the solid surface which have sufficient energy to overcome the activation energy of the reaction. The rate of reaction is also influenced by the orientation of the gas molecules at the time of collision. Other theories which have been proposed include the theory of the diffusion of the gas through the solid, and the theory of the adsorption of the gas on the solid surface. Each of these theories has its own merits and demerits, and the choice of theory depends upon the nature of the reaction and the materials involved.
